Welcome to our penultimate newsletter of the half term. We have had a busy week. The staff did some training this week into how our pupils develop their problem-solving skills through personal and social maths activities. These are fundamental building blocks in the stages they go through to acquire mathematical awareness and make progress, thank you Elana for this. On Thursday, Headteacher Andy Smith delivered some training into how we incorporate drama skills into our reading, sensory story and sensory drama stories. This involved quite a lot of jumping around, throwing ourselves into make believe and creating meaning and marking moments. This is with the aim that staff build their tool kit of options, to add to the great work they already do by bringing stories to life for our young people.

We were also graced with visits by two media companies, one taking video and photographs for our social media platforms and one that was working on helping to promote the school to prospective TA and teaching candidates.

We were further delighted to offer six new TAs a permanent position following two great days of interviews, whom will start with us soon.

We are all looking forward to seeing lots of parents next week on Thursday 15th February at our 'Field of Love' parents event that will include class activity and a group moment based on the work of our current artist Anthony Gormley. Our aim is to create our own Ravensbourne inspired version of his famous art installation Field for the British Isles.
